Images of Experience photographs, 2017-2018, various formats

Project deals with aesthetic concept of visual perception as a sensual experience. I investigate the process of undergoing an experience on the part of both the artist and the spectator. Each of the images is hinting at some of the phenomenon or visual archetype. I analyse the influence of environments of perception and the effects of (neuro-)physical processes in the eye and brain. In the current era of image (and never-ending stream of visual media all around us), understanding of those processes is more important than ever. The main references come from the writings of J. Dewey, J. Berger and neuro-scientists such as L. Kesner. Work is a part of current PhD. art-based research project.

Island of Islands

photographs, 2017-2018, various formats

If there is a sense of reality, there must also be a sense of possibility. To pass freely through open doors, it is necessary to respect the fact that they have solid frames. This principle, by which the old professor had lived, is simply a requisite of the sense of reality. But if there is a sense of reality, and no one will doubt that it has its justifications for existing, then there must also be something we can call a sense of possibility. Whoever has it does not say, for instance: Here this or that has happened, will happen, must happen; but he invents: Here this or that might, could, or ought to happen. If he is told that something is the way it is, he will think: Well, it could probably just as well be otherwise. So the sense of possibility could be defined outright as the ability to conceive of everything there might be just as well, and to attach no more importance to what is than to what is not.

Pavel Matoušek (b. 1989) is a conceptual photographer based in Ústí nad Labem, Czechia.

Raised in a village near Prague, he was always drawn to the worlds of nature and art.

He received MFA in Photography in 2017 and is currently a PhD student of Visual communication, focused on art-based research on image perception. His project is aimed to describe the process of transferring fragments of experience between the artist and the spectator. Pavel's art projects were presented in Portugal, Finland, Germany or France. He worked on international documentary projects in Ladakh, India, Netherlands and Kenya, and has been recognized by the US Embassy Prague, DPreview Readers' Best Shots of 2016 or World Biennial of Student Photography.

We Portray Ordinary Things.

Naturally, we mostly care about the visual properties, design and quality of the object, that may not always be apparent. All the seemingly unrelated motives gradually meet in a visual dialogue which offers a deeper personal statement, enriched by its installation in the exhibition space. We mostly focus on the rhythm, lines, space, surface and universal shapes. We want to explore ephemeral substances of the photographic image and its dependency on time. We also use visual defects that are supposed to remind the viewer that images cannot be read superficially.

Photography and other new media, as the latest ways to describe the world, are constantly evolving at the speed of light. Fine art in general seems to be a perfect tool to redefine the properties and qualities of what we consider reality and what attitude we have towards reality and ourselves. A proper visual translation of core values requires a much stronger focus on philosophy and human sciences than on the technologies alone. If photography is considered a record of information, what will happen when it is stripped off all the historic connotations, taken out of context and deprived of any period signs? Does this latent cut of the photographic image leave something that could be called clean photography? Can it make an impression on the viewer despite not carrying any specific information about its background, space and time? The actual creation process of the photography deprives it of its context and all that is left is just a firmly anchored mimesis – an echo of reality. Here and now, moved into a different timeline.
